The U.S and Its future with NATO

The proposal documented will discuss the United States and its relation to the organization known as NATO (The North Atlantic Treaty Organization), along with how this intergovernmental group's future affects the U.S . This policy is of utmost importance to the United States for multiple reasons. Firstly, NATO has played a critical role in promoting stability and security in Europe and beyond. Secondly, the US is committed to maintaining strong relationships with its allies, and NATO is an indispensable component of this endeavor. Lastly, the US has a long history of leadership and active participation in international organizations. Hence, withdrawing from NATO could be a significant deviation from this tradition.

NATO as a whole has been instrumental in recent news with Russia's full-scale invasion of Ukraine, having fueled the conflict by supporting Ukraine. NATO shares over 100 billion dollars in military aid. The U.S. is a major contributor of this aid to the struggling country, yet all the constant spending on supporting this cause leaves a lingering question. Can the U.S. continue to afford to provide this enormous amount of economic support without any backlash?

As of right now, the U.S. faces numerous problems of its own. Of the many issues the government has tried to resolve, one that has not only politicians speculating but American citizens as well is Inflation.

Moreover, being the second largest oil producer, Russia, after beginning with Ukraine, it's evident that it has severely impacted the energy market. Additionally, according to Nature in the article "The impact of Russia-Ukraine war on crude oil prices: an EMC framework," its prices to crude oil sales. Although this is a more current event, it continues the premise of how the future of NATO will affect the United States. It has damaged the economy and society as a whole by making many officials choose sides. Either supporting the cause or disengaging from such a trivial matter, the consensus stands on whether being a part of NATO will help nations align under one organization or raise problems inside and outside the U.S.

In conclusion, the future of NATO as it relates to the USA is a critical foreign policy topic that has been the focus of much discussion and debate. The central issue is the level of US commitment to the alliance, which has been called into question by some in the current administration. Currently, NATO is an integral part of US foreign policy, with the US being the most significant contributor to the alliance regarding funding and military capabilities. However, there are concerns that the US may begin to withdraw its support for NATO, which could have severe implications for the security of the entire region.
